Summary of Module

This module examines the tourism sector and its role in the experience economy. Perspectives on tourism are explored including the inter-relationship with hospitality, recreation, leisure, events and travel. The tourism market-place is considered in terms of place, space and virtual experience, types of tourist behaviours, tourist as a consumer, demand, supply and motivation. The term 'experience economy' was first used by Pine and Gilmore (1999) and famously they said that "all work is theatre and every business a stage" but has been adopted by many business sectors as a short-hand way to understand what customers and visitors need to make their interactions with a business memorable, valuable and worth repeating. The multi-disciplinary nature of tourism experiences are considered, incorporating brand experience; service experience and consumption experience. In addition students are guided through exploring the tourism environment; the components of the industry and the touchpoints with the experience economy. Students will be supported in applying theoretical models illustrating the realms of visitor experience and reviewing current industry practice in tourism-related operations with a view to assessing the experiential offering. This module will address the following topics: Overview of the tourism industry The developing experience economy The role of experience in visitor behaviour Experiences of visitors in specific realms of entertainment; education; aesthetic and escapist The business of tourism experience evaluation and management
