Summary of Module
Successful modern-day coaching requires evidence based, innovative planning towards holistic and often long-term athlete objectives. Therefore, the strategies coaches use to foster athlete learning and performance can, and should, come from considered thought around how skills are acquired, what learning looks like, and why successful coach and athlete outcomes may and may not occur across different performance situations and coaching environments. This module is embedded in interdisciplinary thought that pulls on sport psychology, skill acquisition, science, and pedagogy related strategies, but situates decision making within the larger coaching process, which is framed through coaching specific theory. Students will be taught how to map out and constructively align their coaching plans with short, medium, and long-term athlete goals. Athletes' psychosocial development will also be targeted, as will motor learning and attentional theories. The connections between these programming variables will be brought to life through experiences created within the module and in students' own coaching environments. As a result, they can begin to exercise their professional judgement to be more effective as practitioners.
This module will assist the student in the development of key 'I am UWS Graduate Attributes' to allow those that complete this module to be:
